I hope you will join us at IGF5 (the fifth Internet Governance Forum) in Vilnius, Lithuania where Chris Corbin for the European Public Sector Information Platform and Antonio Saravia for Proyecto Aporta have co-organised Workshop 120: ‘Public sector information online: democratic, social and economic potentials’.

Remote participants can follow our workshop using videocasts or audiocasts, and can send text questions which I, as the volunteer remote moderator, will forward to the Panel when the floor is opened for questions from the audience.

You can participate remotely from a hub or as an individual. It is not too late to join as no registration is necessary. We will also provide messages by Twitter. In Vilnius time the workshop is scheduled for Friday September 17th from 11.30am – 1.30pm (to convert this into your time visit this site).

As moderator, I have been thinking about why the issue of access to and re-use of PSI is a global one. In 2008, the OECD played a significant role in proposing policy principles. Since then the World Bank has made available datasets for re-use - making apparent the potential benefits of international institutions being aware of the value of their datasets.

I have also been reflecting on how the open data movement has been building momentum encouraging the development of data.gov catalogues and the use of creative commons licensing. This movement has been innovative and collaborative. It emphasises not just the economic potential of unlocking PSI but the democratic and social potentials of PSI.

It shows us the power of collaboration. It enables us to share common experiences, build momentum, overcome barriers and develop good practice. We can see the potential to share data locally, nationally and across borders in empowering the citizen, increasing accountability and releasing creativity (whether for commercial or non-commercial purposes).

The opportunity to share experiences in a world forum stimulates debate particularly when participants can engage remotely. For this reason, I am looking forward to acting as the moderator for Workshop 120 and invite you to join us remotely, follow twitter or put questions to me that I can take with me to the forum..
