Description

The Open Data Institute (ODI) is a non-profit organisation founded in 2012 to advocate for the innovative use of open data to affect positive change across the globe. They work with companies and governments to build an open, trustworthy data ecosystem.

Benefits

The ODI argues that they strive to bring sustainable behavioural changes within companies and governments that hold and use data.

How open data is used

-  Sector programs: coordinating organisations to tackle a social or economic problem with data and an open approach.
-  Practical advocacy: working as a friend with businesses and government and creating products that support change.
-  Peer networks: bringing peers in similar situations together.
